All sectors of the global shipping industry face a number of challenges in meeting existing and anticipated environmental regulations, all of which will require significant changes to the way in which the global fleet operates.

With the shipping industry under increasing scrutiny from Administrations, environmental campaigners, and the general public to reduce the impact operations have on the marine environment, Clean Shipping International provides invaluable insight into the regulatory, technical, operational, and commercial issues driving the 'green' marine agenda.

With informed articles and opinion pieces from industry leaders, shipowners and environmental experts, each edition of Clean Shipping International provides in-depth analysis of the environmental problems and solutions relating to ship-to-air and ship-to-sea emissions, enabling the ship operating community to make more informed decisions.

Within each issue, we tackle a range of subjects affecting sustainable shipping. We consider the commercial, operational and technical implications in meeting environmental regulations; consider emergent environmental issues relating to ship operation; evaluate the different solutions available; and address how climate change will have a wider impact on global trade.

Clean Shipping International strives to provide information and research data to better inform industry, national and international authorities, non-governmental organizations and the public on the environmental performance and benefits of Exhaust Gas Cleaning Systems (EGCS) and associated air and water emissions.
